Module Outline

Course Description:

As a modern state, the People's Republic of China (PRC) continues to amaze and confound observers both inside and outside its borders. More than four decades after opening its doors to the outside world, China remains as important as it is misunderstood, especially in recent years, as it has reversed some of these fundamental trends toward reform and opening up. This course is designed to provide you with a road map to help understand the fascinating world of Chinese politics and the contemporary Chinese state by providing different perspectives on China's past achievements, its political and economic future, and the global implications of China's rise. The course presumes no prior knowledge of China.

This course relies on vigorous (and rigorous) discussion and debate during our seminar meeting times. It is very important that you have mastered the readings before we meet. This will be the starting point of our seminar discussions each week. Towards the end, you will be required to prepare one to two pages (in total) weekly memos on the readings in which you provide the following information on each reading (due the night before class):

- Argument: a one-sentence statement of the thesis
- Literature review: Who and what is the piece responding to?
- Variables: (DV, INDV, and casual theory): if applicable
- Research design: case selection, data generation, theory building and testing vs. Description
- Critique: You may discuss weakness(es) of the piece. However, also critically evaluate its merits. In other words, why was it published?

In addition to these memos and seminar participation, your grade will also be based on a policy analysis paper due at the end of the term. The policy analysis paper is where to choose a policy of your choice and dissect the background and purpose of the specific policy (approximately 5 pages). Websites where you can access policies will be provided by the instructor (English versions available).
